Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .injunction in this case, entitled London Whiffs, is a device purely fanciful and arbitrary, and, in no way, suggestive of the color, ingredients, mode of composition, of the article to which such label is attached, and that, therefore, the label is itself the subject of a trade-mark or exclusive right to a trade-mark. The evidence establishing, then, that the plaintiffs had used this device for the term of two years or more prior to its adoption by the defendant, and it being now apparent that it is the subject of a trade-mark, that is, that it is a subject that the plaintiffs could acquire the exclusive right to use, we are remitted to the next question in order, that is, whether the label adopted by the defendants, and now used by the defendants, is a colorable imitation of the label of plaintiffs. Numerous cases in this connection have been cited, and I myself have conducted an examination somewhat elaborate in reference to this subject. In the case of Sperry and Company, appellant, v. Percival Milling Co. respondent, 81 Cal., 252, Judge McFarland uses this language: The rule governing such cases is that if the limitation of a trade-mark is intentionally so close as to deceive an ordinary purchaser, the defendant is liable, and the fact that an attentive inspection will disclose differences in even many respects between the two articles will not shield him. The same test is laid down as the one governing this question,...
