Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Hemolymph Nodes of the Sheep: Studies on Hemolymph Nodes I Although there are many considerations which would seem to suggest that the term hemolymph is a misnomer when applied to these nodes, this designation, which was suggested by Russel and first used by Robertson [24], is retained throughout a part of this article in order not to introduce a discussion of terms at the very beginning. It is necessary to state, however, that the terms peripheral and central sinuses have been rejected altogether, because no one has shown that they are comparable to the corresponding structures of lymph nodes. The only true sinuses of hemolymph nodes are the radicles of the venous system; the venous lacunae of Weidenreich; which structurally are tremendously dilated capillaries, and which form an integral part of the vascular system of the hemolymph node. The so-called peripheral and central sinuses of the hemolymph nodes can much more properly be designated as subcapsular or marginal and central - in the sense of internal only - blood spaces or areas, than as sinuses, since they are neither in direct communication with either the lymphatic or vascular circulations, as a rule. The sheep was also chosen as the first subject of experiment and inquiry, because almost all investigators of hemolymph nodes had studied them in this animal to a greater or less extent; because the nodes are much more numerous than in any of the other domestic animals studied; and since a convenient, inexpensive, and also an abundant supply of material was afforded by the abattoirs, where an unlimited number of embryos and fetuses of all ages could easily be obtained. In addition,...
